History The former Romanesque station building, on the north side of the incoming (to Grand Central Terminal) platform, was built in 1888, making it the second oldest remaining station building on the New Harbour Line, according to a plaque in the building. It was also a replacement for the original Mamaroneck New York and New Haven Railroad station built in 1848 over Mamaroneck Avenue on the corner of Mount Pleasant and Bishop Avenues. [4] The original station in Mamaroneck burned in February 1889. [5] The station building was originally located at rail level next to the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad (NH) platforms. The building was moved to an embankment to its current location in the 1920s to accommodate the construction of the New York, Westchester and Boston Railway (NYW&B) and separate tunnels connected the building with the respective platforms of the railroad. [6] A second NYW&B depot was also built in the Larchmont Gardens neighborhood in the Northeast, which today is a Girl Scout building. After leaving the NYW&B in 1937, the area formerly inhabited by the building and NYW&B platforms and tracks was converted into a parking lot, and the building remained at the bottom of the embankment at Station Plaza, adjacent to Columbus Park. The tunnel to the NYW&B was closed and the exits to the former NYW&B platforms were covered. The tunnel to the NH platforms remained open. Unlike many other stations on the line, the Mamaroneck station does not include a pedestrian overpass. As with all New Haven Line stations in Westchester County, the station was Penn Central station when it was acquired by Penn Central in 1969. The station was built in the early 1970s to high-level platforms. This was done to accommodate the arrival of new train cars that were then known as Cosmopolitans, now better known as M2s. The new cars did not include boarding passes, or traps, as their predecessor 4400 Pullman Washboard cars did, and could only take passengers on stations with high-level platforms. The update was done in two stages, with the eastern half of the station being upgraded first; than the western half. This reconstruction project took place despite Penn Central's continuous financial desperation throughout the 1970s, which forced them to turn over their commuter service to the Metropolitan Transportation Authority. MTA transferred the station to Metro-Noord in 1983. For the 2006 U.S. Open golf tournament at the nearby Winged Foot Golf Club, the usually local Mamaroneck station temporarily became an express station. The station building was closed October 9, 2007, by the owner Metro-North Railroad after removal of the ticket agent and in preparation for the sale. Tickets are now sold via a ticket machine next to the platform. The station building was then sold in February 2008 for $1.25 million to Verco Properties, a Bronx real estate investment company. [7] The station building was converted into a lower-level restaurant (accessible from lower parking and from the outbound platform tunnel) and higher-level commercial office (accessible from rail-level parking). The restaurant opened as Club Car in 2012 and closed in 2015. [8] After a brief renovation, the restaurant reopened later in 2015 as Modern on the Rails. [9] Nevertheless, the station is recognized as a local historical landmark, along with the site of the original NY&NH station. [10] The layout of the station The two side platforms can currently handle up to 10 car trains. [11]:19 As of August 2006, weekday commuter ridership was 2,392. [12] There are 623 parking spaces, including a combination of MNR and municipal measured and permit parking spaces. A large part of the parking capacity is not directly next to the station. [13] The postal platforms are accessible to access via ramps, but the station is not considered fully compatible with ADA's requirements in that the route between platforms is difficult, and the auto-drop is proposed.
